BABY PYGMY MARMOSET TWINS

Recently the Zoo welcomed the addition of two baby pygmy marmosets. For the twin’s parents, this is the first time they have successfully raised babies without the assistance of zookeepers.

The pygmy marmoset is one of the smallest primates and is the smallest true money. Their average weight is around 4.5 lbs and are between 5 to 8 inches tall. Baby pygmy marmosets, such as the ones at the Zoo, are the size of a human thumb when first born.

The two babies can be found in the Animal Kingdom Building at the Zoo.

ON THE COVER: REILLO

After fourteen months, Reillo, the Zoo’s pygmy marmoset, has been introduced to a new friend. Chirpa, who is three years old, traveled from the Houston Zoo to live with Reillo.

For Reillo, this is an important milestone. He was hand-raised by zookeeper Sarah and has only had human contact up to this point. He will now gain valuable instincts and learn pygmy marmoset behavioral patterns through living with Chirpa.

A BRIGHT FUTURE

HOW THE LINCOLN CHILDREN’S ZOO IS MAKING A WORLD OF DIFFERENCE

BY RYAN GROSS

When a baby is born at Lincoln Children’s Zoo, it is an exciting time. In May, staff celebrated the birth of five ring-tailed lemurs. When these babies were born, it was a step in ensuring their future, a step in preserving their wonder for a future generation, and one of the things that makes Lincoln Children’s Zoo special.

Over the years, many babies have been born at the Zoo. Many survive their first few months by the care of their mother. These babies will grow up and travel to zoos across the country in hope of breeding new babies.

However, in order to survive, some of these babies need more care than their mother can provide. When this happens zookeepers step in and do their best to ensure a future for the animal.

In the past couple of years this has happened several times. One of the Zoo’s most famous residents Reillo, the pygmy marmoset, was hand-raised by zookeeper Sarah. Reillo is now more than a year old and is on his way to a long happy life.

The fifth ring-tailed lemur born this summer also had to be cared for by a zookeeper. The new baby was not receiving adequate care from its mother, so zookeepers stepped in to help. Three zookeepers – Missy, Patricia and Stephanie – are caring for the baby lemur. For four months they will take turns living at the Zoo, caring for the baby every hour of every day.

Whether it’s under the care of their parents or the commitment of Zoo staff, these new babies are being given a chance to survive with the hope that they will make a difference and give future generations an opportunity to see their wonder. For the past 47 years at your Lincoln Children’s Zoo, zookeepers have been helping baby animals thrive and grow to be healthy, able adults.
Every five years the Lincoln Children’s Zoo is evaluated by experts and leaders in the zoo and aquarium field. This thorough evaluation takes place to ensure the Zoo meets and exceeds the standards created by the Association of Zoos and Aquariums (AZA). We sat down with AZA Executive Director, Kris Vehrs, to see what makes this accreditation so important.

Kris, can you tell Zootracks readers a little about AZA?
AZA is an organization that offers support to zoos and aquariums across the country. Member organizations such as Lincoln Children’s Zoo receive resources from AZA which allow them to be leaders and innovators in animal care, wildlife conservation and science, conservation education, the guest experience and community engagement.

What is AZA accreditation?
Accreditation means: official recognition and approval of your zoo by a group of experts. These experts ensure only zoos and aquariums that meet the highest of standards become members of AZA.

What is the accreditation process?
The process takes many months to complete. First, the zoo or aquarium will need to fill out a detailed questionnaire and application. After the application is approved a team of inspectors will visit the organization. The team of inspectors will spend many long days examining the entire facility and creating a detailed report. Once complete, the report is reviewed by the accreditation commission which decides whether or not to grant accreditation. Once granted, an organization is accredited for five years until the process begins again.

Why is it important for Lincoln Children’s Zoo to be part of AZA?
Fewer than 10 percent of animal exhibitors licensed by the United States Department of Agriculture are AZA accredited. That means Lincoln Children’s Zoo meets the highest of industry standards.

What are the benefits of AZA accreditation?
AZA accredited zoos and aquariums are well-respected and receive valuable support from AZA and our member organizations. It also allows zoos like Lincoln Children’s Zoo to exchange animals with other zoos for the purpose of breeding. Plus, it allows members to receive discounted or free admission to more than 200 other AZA member organizations.

Thank you, Kris, for taking time to tell Zootracks readers a little about AZA and the importance of accreditation and membership.

National Geographic Chief Environmental Correspondent Anne Thompson and photographer Joel Sartore during NBC Nightly News filming at Lincoln Children’s Zoo.

In March nearly 10 million people watching NBC Nightly News with Brian Williams got an inside look at Lincoln Children’s Zoo. Chief Environmental Correspondent Anne Thompson told the story of how Joel Sartore’s biodiversity project started at a children’s zoo in Lincoln, Neb.

The piece, which was broadcast nationwide, as well as on NBC’s different websites, helped bring exposure to Sartore’s project of photographing endangered species. Sartore started his project at Lincoln Children’s Zoo about six years ago by photographing a John Chapo. The project grew to photographing thousands of species from around the world.

The newscast also shed light on the work Lincoln Children’s Zoo is doing to help save species one animal at a time. “Having nearly 10 million people see what we do here at the Zoo and what Joel is doing with his project is an amazing benefit for both of us,” said John Chapo, president and CEO of the Zoo.

Chapo also noted having a news feature on NBC allows people to see a different side of the Zoo. “Behind the scenes, our staff is doing some amazing things by hand-raising a baby ring-tailed lemur, spending nights at the Zoo when animals are ill, working with other zoos to breed endangered animals and countless other acts,” Chapo said.

Those who missed the NBC Nightly News broadcast can visit www.lincolnzoo.org to watch the video. Further information about Joel Sartore’s project and other works can be found at joelsartore.com.
In 1965, Arnott Folsom opened Lincoln Children’s Zoo. He wanted to create a zoo where children and adults could interact with the animals and be surrounded by nature. An avid gardener, he begun planning trees, flowers and bushes throughout the property. For the past 47 years, one of Lincoln’s most beautiful nature spots has grown, but only under the guidance of nature’s keepers.

In the 1980s the Zoo welcomed another gardening visionary in John Chapo. Chapo, the current president and CEO, shared Mr. Folsom’s philosophy and began putting his mark on the Zoo’s property. He added a bigger variety of plants and created more opportunities to interact with nature.

The tradition of great gardeners continues today. Horticulturist Ike Fuenning currently oversees the Zoo’s grounds, spending his days caring for thousands of species of plants and laying out his vision.

Arnott Folsom’s children zoo has grown into Lincoln’s number one family destination. Its success is rooted in his dream to create a zoo where interaction with animals and nature were top priority. The passion of John Chapo and Ike Fuenning will ensure Mr. Folsom’s dream continues long into the future.
